

Federal Judge Orders New Settlement Hearing in $240 Million Defective Pistols Case – Taurus Pistol Safety Defects

02.05.2016

Efforts have been ratcheted up to notify owners of defective pistols manufactured by Taurus International of their rights under a settlement negotiated by Bailey Glasser attorney David L. Selby II of the firm's Birmingham, Alabama office, and Todd Wheelles of Morris, Haynes, Wheelles, Knowles & Nelson.

News of the settlement, which allows owners of the defective pistols to have them repaired or replaced has appeared in Reuters, Yahoo! Finance, MarketWatch, and the Boston Globe.

There is no registry of owners of the defective pistols, so it's important to alert the gun-owning public to the settlement. Owners of Taurus pistols can check the settlement website to see if their weapons are potentially defective.

Several models of Taurus pistols suffer from a "drop fire" defect that allows them to discharge even when the safety is on. Selby and Wheelles represented Sheriff's Deputy Chris Carter of Scott County, Iowa, after his Taurus pistol discharged accidentally while he was apprehending a suspect, even though the safety was engaged.
